

Social Model of Disability: Attitudinal Barriers

The biggest challenge for those who have disabilities is typically not the disability itself, but rather the attitudinal barriers imposed by others. "Attitudinal barriers" are ways of thinking or feeling resulting in behavior that limit the potential of people with disabilities to be independent individuals.

Dehumanizing

Barrier	Change you can make
Seeing the person only in terms of his/her/their disability.
Not recognizing the whole person; assuming everything in his/her/their life—emotions, relationships, work, and choices—revolves around the disability.
Acting as if people with disabilities have no emotions, no sexuality, impaired intelligence, and/or no ability or make decisions for themselves.
Not talking directly to the person. Talking about the person in his/her/their presence.
Not establishing eye contact.

Generalizing

Barrier	Change you can make
Denying people's uniqueness as individuals because they have disabilities.
Assuming that one person represents (or is just like) all people with disabilities.
Assuming that someone with one disability necessarily has others, too (for instance, believing that someone with a speech impediment must also have intellectual disabilities impaired intelligence, and/or no ability or make decisions for themselves.
Not recognizing the diversity of disabilities, and the diversity of people who share any particular disability.
Searching for the single right answer about how to act with people with disabilities; not recognizing that every individual is in a unique place with his own process and self-identity.

Disempowering

Barrier	Change you can make
Assuming that people with disabilities cannot know what is best for themselves.
Not listening to people with disabilities.
Imposing "help" rather than offering it, thereby taking control away from the person.
Always hiring able-bodied people to design and administer social services for people with disabilities.
Withholding the authority and/or information that would enable a person with a disability to make his/her/their own decisions.

Social Model of Disability: Attitudinal Barriers

Using Oppressive Language

Barrier	Change you can make
Equating sick with bad, as in "crazy," "retarded," "sickening," "special," and "deaf and dumb."
Segregating
Believing people with disabilities will all want work related to their disability.
Assuming people with disabilities should work, live, or learn only with other people with disabilities.
Scheduling only special activities for accessibility, rather than making all activities accessible.

Overprotecting

Barrier	Change you can make
Holding lower expectations of people with disabilities, or giving work that's too easy.
Soft-pedaling negative feedback for fear of disabled peoples' reaction.
Making decisions for people with disabilities to "protect" them from failing or getting hurt.
Tracking people with disabilities only into certain job fields.

Excluding

Barrier	Change you can make
Not shaking hands.
Not including a person with disabilities in social or work-related activities.
Choosing activities or meeting places that are inaccessible (no elevators or wide bathrooms for people with wheelchairs, no sign language translators, etc.).
Seeking an opinion or perspective from someone with disabilities only on disability-related issues; imagining that he or she does not have valuable opinions and experience on the same breadth of issues you do.
